

Review of: "How Do Academicians Publish More Research Papers for Their Promotion and Positions? A Scrutiny of CV"

Gayatri Dwivedi

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

1. The paper's plot or pith is good and relevant; not many have written about it. So there is an element of novelty to it.
2. It is like who will bell the cat; it captures a real dilemma of the scholars; but that is not universal. I know guides who have said no when they had not contributed; though their overall support was there. But not specifically to the paper on hand.
3. Repercussions /Implications of any such move - a blanket order or policy move against the popular trend- should also be taken into consideration in the narrative. Maybe a bit of passive resistance when support is sought or a dent in the cordiality -MAYBE
4. Keywords should capture the essence of the paper or the core issue -it is about. (suggestion - authorship-authenticity, or something that reflects the issue and helps to search it out when someone looks for expert comments in the context.
5. In-text citation ( a specific style is to be followed - like I follow APA where Meera Shankar 2021 will be - Shankar,2021;)
6. References are very few; more references add validity to your research and the comprehensive nature of your efforts.
7. The core question is right, but I am just being devil's advocate- if I am guiding 10 or more students and they are working on 2 papers each. I share my viewpoints /insights and experience with them on their respective topics of research. With my input, I rightfully earn the right to be one of the authors ( yes, not the first one)
8. the point raised is valid and one of the issues in academia. But the piece needs to say - how did you reach the facts that you have mentioned? Citations. Some portions are bereft of any citations
9. What methodology did you use? It can be just one line wherein you say how did you reach all the relevant information/data you have worked on for the paper.
- 10 .But overall I liked the central idea- the issue the entry spotlights
