

Review of: "'Women come out for less important tasks': Understanding the reality of the gendered transport sector in Karachi through Key-Informant Interviews"

Lilian San Martín Medina¹

¹ Universidad Nacional Andrés Bello

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

"Women are shunted to less important tasks: Understanding the gender dynamics of the Karachi transport sector through key informant interviews"

The article "'Women are shunted to less important tasks: Understanding the gender dynamics of the Karachi transport sector through key informant interviews'" is an important study that sheds light on the situation of women in the transport sector in Karachi, Pakistan. The study uses key informant interviews to explore the experiences of women in this male-dominated sector.

The study's findings are revealing. Women are underrepresented in the transport sector, and when they are present, they are often assigned less important tasks or paid less than men. The obstacles that women face in the transport sector are numerous, and include discrimination, violence, and lack of opportunity.

The study is well-written and well-organized. The authors provide a detailed description of the context of the transport sector in Karachi, and their findings are well-grounded in the interview data. The study is relevant to a wide audience, including transportation professionals, academics, and women's rights activists.

Recommendations:

The study could be further improved with the inclusion of quantitative data to complement the qualitative interview data. This would help to provide a more complete picture of the situation of women in the transport sector in Karachi.

In addition, the study could explore in greater depth the causes of the obstacles that women face in this sector. This would help to develop policies and programs to address these obstacles and promote gender equality in the transport sector.

Overall, the article "'Women are shunted to less important tasks: Understanding the gender dynamics of the Karachi transport sector through key informant interviews'" is an important study that contributes to our understanding of the situation of women in the transport sector in Pakistan.