

Review of: "The Parental Role in Child Sexuality: A Phenomenological Study"

Shikha Trivedi

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The authors have picked culturally sensitive title which is often overlooked. It's a good effort. Many parents were comfortable in answering the questions, only a few preferred that this issue of sexuality be handled by churches or religious organizations. The research questions of the study need to be explicitly stated in the abstract, to give readers the focus of the study. The background of the study is comprehensive but with so many short paragraphs. Some of the content on attachment and parenting style can be summarized. The literature used is old. An appropriate tool was used for data collection. The semi-structured interview is appropriate for exploring parents' perceptions on child sexuality. The instrument was validated which is very important in any research. Population and sampling of the study are justified. This study effectively presents the study's main findings. The most interesting finding is that parents prioritize themselves over schools and churches for sex education. It is advisable to use either tables or figures to present the data, otherwise it is a repetition. In the discussion researcher's voice is missing which is very important to see how the researcher has understood the study. The study maintained the research ethics. In conclusion, this study introduces a valuable exploration of a significant gap in research on child sexuality.