

Review of: "[Commentary] Decolonisation of Health Care in Tanzania"

Fabiana Sciarelli¹

¹ University of Naples - L'Orientale

Potential competing interests: I find the serious, clear, determined and shareable point of view very interesting. I believe that dealing with colonization and decolonization, be it political, economic, health, scientific and/or cultural, is a very topical topic for European and African countries. The admission of errors committed in the past and still ongoing, such as the choice to export cultural models with economic ones, must certainly be a starting point. This article, which is certainly an opinion piece, for the contemporary scientific approach has the limitation of being based mainly on qualitative research/direct observation, which however, in my opinion, if correct is no less important than purely quantitative research. I think that this article is courageous, that it is worth reading because it clarifies points that are often obscure or absolutely underestimated, such as the need to work together to allow better healthcare in all places in former colonial countries but also in former colonizing countries.

I find the serious, clear, determined, and shareable point of view very interesting. I believe that dealing with colonization and decolonization, be it political, economic, health, scientific, and/or cultural, is a very topical topic for all European and African countries. The admission of errors committed in the past and still ongoing, such as the choice to export cultural models together with economic ones, must certainly be a starting point.

This article, which is certainly an opinion piece, has the limitation of being based mainly on qualitative research/direct observation, which, however, in my opinion, if correct, is no less important than purely quantitative research.

I think that this article is courageous, that it is worth reading because it clarifies points that are often obscure or absolutely underestimated, such as the need to work together to allow better healthcare in all places in former colonial countries but also in former colonizing countries.