The overall impression of the work is good. The study is unique in its observation. However, there are some areas that require further attention to enhance the manuscript.

Abstract:

- It is recommended to make the abstract more concise and informative.
- Start with a brief introduction that provides background information and highlights what is already known. Then, clarify how the article addresses the research gap and the rationale for the study.
- Include a brief overview of the methodology employed.
- Additionally, consider presenting the findings in a nuanced manner. For example, the absence of adequate lighting may be one contributing factor to violence and crime against women, but it is not the sole cause. There may be multiple underlying factors at play.
- Lastly, provide a brief elaboration on the concept of a "dangerous location."

Introduction: Reframe the introductory paragraph to ensure a smooth transition and flow of ideas.

Literature Review: Establish a stronger connection between the research gap and the rationale behind the study in the literature review section.

Methodology: Clearly specify whether the papers used in the study were sourced from peer-reviewed journals, and how were they collected. Provide a brief clarification of what is meant by a "dangerous location." Include a concise description of the data analysis methodology.

Results and Discussion: Begin this section by presenting your findings and then proceed to relate them to existing studies.

Recommendations: Conclude the manuscript by offering recommendations based on the findings of your study.
