

Review of: "Women in Military: Breaking Barriers & Shaping the Future"

Lalhmunlien Robert Varte¹

¹ Ministry of Defence

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

A much needed research topic in these modern times. However, I think this is a preliminary study only? It would be of immense importance to see how other countries, for example, Israel, the UK, etc., which have been employing women in the forces for quite some time, identify challenges and how they overcome them. Your initiative to study the role of women in the armed forces is both timely and crucial. Historically, the military has been predominantly male-dominated, and understanding the journey of women within this realm is pivotal for several reasons.

Firstly, examining the historical context provides insights into the barriers women have faced in accessing and participating in military roles. From discriminatory policies to cultural biases, women have had to navigate a complex landscape to establish their presence and contributions in the forces. This historical perspective sheds light on the progress made and the challenges that still exist today.

Secondly, delving into the current state of affairs offers an opportunity to assess the representation of women in various military roles and their impact. This involves analyzing recruitment policies, training programs, and career advancement opportunities available to women. Understanding the experiences of women serving in different capacities within the armed forces is crucial for promoting inclusivity and addressing any existing disparities.

Moreover, exploring the role of women in the forces involves examining the unique physiological and anatomical differences between men and women. An anthropometric study is essential for designing equipment, uniforms, and gear that accommodate the diverse needs of female personnel. From body armor to ergonomic considerations for equipment use, ensuring that military resources are tailored to fit women optimally is not just a matter of equality but also one of operational effectiveness and safety.

In conclusion, your research holds immense potential to contribute to the broader discourse on gender equality, military effectiveness, and societal perceptions of women's roles. By shedding light on the experiences, challenges, and contributions of women in the armed forces, you are not only documenting history but also paving the way for a more inclusive and equitable future.