The article provides an interesting take on the land rights discourse in Africa (in this case, Zimbabwe). It is well-written and thoroughly researched in terms of the history of farming in Zimbabwe and the conflict between indigenous people, the private sector, and the government. The article is thought-provoking and calls for policymakers to address the landlessness plight of people, especially on communal land, despite customary and traditional rights and practices providing that people should have access to resources such as land, water, etc.
