This article is an interesting testimony to the importance of integrating field experience into public health training courses. Public health is not a discipline, but a scientific and social field of action. The scientific approach alone is not enough to solve concrete problems. A social approach that is not based on scientific elements is blind.

The article is well-written and its content is not confined to India. The need to know how to analyze the specific needs of each community is a universal challenge. Listening is fundamental to public health. This article provides a concrete illustration.
