

Review of: "Agritourism: a source for socio-economic transformation in developing economies"

I Arul Aram¹

¹ Anna University

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

This study titled 'This study titled 'Agritourism: a source for socio-economic transformation in developing economies' states that it is a review article and does not have primary data. The authors might have included a meta-analysis to make the study more scientific. The study captures the scenarios in agritourism around the globe, making this study a readable synthesis for prerequisite knowledge in agritourism. The authors' view on Sustainable Development Goals combining it with agritourism is an appreciable effort though not related to the model of agritourism transformation mentioned in the beginning and not linked in the conclusion. The study is a well-read review with insight into improving the livelihood of farmers and the environment spurred by economic support from tourism. The implication of practice and policy needs more data-based studies with locals. ' states that it is a review article and does not have primary data. The authors might have included a meta-analysis to make the study more scientific. The study captures the scenarios in agritourism around the globe, making this study a readable synthesis for prerequisite knowledge in agritourism. The authors' view on Sustainable Development Goals combining it with agritourism is an appreciable effort though not related to the model of agritourism transformation mentioned in the beginning and not linked in the conclusion. The study is a well-read review with insight into improving the livelihood of farmers and the environment spurred by economic support from tourism. The implication of practice and policy needs more data-based studies with locals.