According to the authors, the objectives of the study are to understand the current housing challenges in Uganda and, to analyze the socio-economic impact of inadequate housing. Unfortunately, in my opinion, none of these were achieved. The paper needs to be reorganized. Some texts are repeated throughout the paper, and the results are in reality a brief discussion of limiting factors. The success stories section is limited to a single study. A good strategy could be the presentation of other success cases, even if related to other countries.

The paper proposed to address a very important subject which, unfortunately, is a problem present in several countries. In this sense, studies related to affordable and sustainable houses need to be encouraged.
