Review of "Who Is Responsible for Preventing Children's Sexual Harassment?":

1. The topic addressed in this research is highly relevant and timely. Researchers must not only present empirical data on child sexual abuse incidents but also delve deeper into the determinants of factors that trigger sexual harassment.
2. In the introduction, the researcher discusses the phenomenon of child sexual abuse based on personal perception without supporting it with previous research, especially studies highlighting the alarming rate of sexual harassment in Indonesia.
3. Theories related to the behavioral mechanisms that contribute to the development of sexual harassment behavior, which could provide a deeper understanding of the phenomenon, are scarcely supported.
4. The research methods section lacks a detailed explanation of the research procedure. It would be more effective to present the methods in a clear, easy-to-understand matrix format, supported by references to the latest research methodologies
