The article is interesting, well-structured, and has a solid and coherent research methodology presented. The bibliographic references are up-to-date, and the article offers an analysis of the role of electronic school counseling in contemporary education, aspects for which I congratulate the authors of the study. However, I would like to mention two amendments: there is a need to provide more details about the specific data collection tools used in the methodology, and the discussion section, regarding the interpretation of the results compared to what was recorded in other studies, should be improved.
