

Review of: "Online learning during the COVID-19 pandemic, lessons learned and what's next?"

Angelina Kirkova-Bogdanova¹

¹ Medical University Plovdiv

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The paper is a nice attempt to learn lessons from the forced online learning during the pandemic and to draw out directions for changes to ensure a quality planned post-pandemic e-learning process. It sounds more that like a journalistic article rather than a research paper. No need to have a whole paragraph about social distancing as a measure to mitigate the risk of spreading the COVID-19 infection - this is not the focus. I would recommend the author to follow the structure of a systematic review or an original article. What I miss in this paper is the methodology of the investigation. I also do not quite distinguish between literature review and own results. The author's experience and competence in e-learning is evident but I would expect to see clearly defined literature review, results and discussion. Please, state the criteria for the selection of the sources, and the sources themselves, of the best practices in e-learning - these are a major focus in the paper. By the way, I liked your idea with the best practices in a table with graphics - a nice way to attract attention. Wish you success!