The article is eye opening as it brings an alternative way to face the climate crisis in the public health context. Well written and poses important points for reflection. One aspect I would say was not well elaborated on is that in the current context of localization of donor funds and phase out of INGOs - what should be or needs to be the role of governments in affected countries, and most importantly how should the local NGOs and civil society position themselves? This is because I think in the near future these 3 actors will be the key drivers of any sustainable and effective climate agenda.
