A research article should state its main goal. In the article submitted for review, the authors defined two goals in the introduction, but in the conclusions there is no reference to the fact that the presented goal was achieved. The goal should be related to the title. "Efficiency" was used in the title. The article lacks information on the level of efficiency in company. There is no scientific aspect, which translates into the lack of results presented graphically. The article should be supplemented with research in the discussed area. The conclusions do not bring anything new to science. Applications should include information about the results obtained, the importance of the work and highlight the scientific contribution and differences from others. In its current form, the article is only a good introduction. Perhaps this is the beginning of the authors' research in this area.
