

Review of: "A Review of Informal Employment Research"

Robert Luanda Baroki

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The paper explores a topic of great interest for policy makers in developing countries, where the acknowledgement of the importance of the informal sector as one of engine of inclusive growth contrasts with lack of clear policy measures to support the sector.

Tow main comments on this manuscript:

1. It is not clear how the authors methodologically aproach the review of the existing literature on the topic. They can follow Kitchenham et al., (2019), Ayim et al., (2020) for a well designed Systematic Literature Review as this seems to be the prefer methodological approach following the paper's title itself;
2. The paper does not, thought, provide policy indications on how the sector can be institutionnally supported for the benefit of its' key actors especially women.
