Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

This study analysed the policy dialogue for nutrition of women and adolescent girls across all systems and sectors throughout their lifecycles. The results emphasized the importance of progress on nutrition for overall sustainable development in Rwanda. It is interesting and helpful for the wicked problems and the implications for the UN sustainable development goals.

However, there are some issues or questions could be addressed:

- 1) In the abstract, the important meaning and crucial novel contributions of this study should be explained clearly.
- 2) In the Section 1 of Introduction, the important meaning and existed problems of different malnutrition studies should be indicated in detail. Additionally, the problems of previous studies or the challenges should be summarized clearly.
- 3) In the next sections, what are the important methods and contributions for this study? The listed results in these sections are very commonly qualitative conclusions without quantitative analysis.
- 4) In the study, the experiments data and the computing method of the results were not described in detail, the experimental analysis should be explored deeply.
