

Review of: "Generic Competences in University Students from Barranquilla, Colombia"

Breda McCarthy<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> James Cook University of North Queensland

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

This work addresses the issue of graduates, their generic competencies and this is especially timely given recent developments in Artificial Intelligence (AI) and the role that University graduates play as future leaders in business or in institutions focused on resolving complex, ethical issues, including AI and environmental problems. Given that there are many studies in this area, stronger theorizing is needed, and some statements in relation to how this work addresses a research gap in the literature would enhance the work. The links between the findings and the curriculum policy of the University could be explored and explained further.