Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The article seems promising, but it is a review of the literature instead of a research study.

Abstract: You are missing your methodology.

Introduction: Define what you mean by "community service"; it may have different meanings across cultures, so it is important that you define what you mean so that we are all on the same page. Also, how are digital identities and inclusion related to community service? Make sure to expand and add some transition words, because otherwise, it seems you're changing the topic too abruptly. Also, what do you mean by "desktop study"?

Method: You need to describe how you gathered data. Is this, then, just a literature review and not an actual study? If so, your research question should be more focused on the analysis of literature, not on exploring. Your study would be more interesting and valuable if you applied some instruments and got your own findings. Is it possible that you could do it?

Results and discussion: You are really not discussing a lot, but rather just listing the main points of other studies.

Your paper provides interesting insights, but it would be more valuable if you gathered your own data using some instruments. Otherwise, there isn't really anything new in the field, as you are just summarizing what you read. You can also go deeper into the literature and analyze it thoroughly, but I do think you can come up with interesting findings if you decide to turn your review of the literature into, for example, a case study.
