Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Review:

The research is rooted in social work practice, and it employs a thoughtful and well-structured methodology to investigate the intricate interplay of social, economic, and cultural factors within this context.

Strengths:

With regards to methodology: The article combines both quantitative and qualitative research methods. The use of questionnaires, interviews, and secondary data sources is precise and fits to the study's objectives. Its depths to the analysis are coherent. Ethical considerations are appropriately addressed.

The objectives are clearly exposed, providing comprehensive understanding of the study's purpose and scope. This clarity guides the reader throughout the article.

The adoption of the Strengths-Based Perspective as the theoretical framework aligns seamlessly with the principles of social work.

The article offers a robust presentation of findings, with clear graphical representations and percentages of respondents' views on the social, economic, and cultural factors impacting community development. This data-driven approach enhances the credibility of the research.

Practical Recommendations: The conclusion of the article provides practical recommendations for social work practitioners, emphasizing the importance of community engagement and active participation. These recommendations are rooted in the research findings and offer valuable guidance for real-world practice.

Contribution to the Field: The article effectively addresses a gap in the social work literature by exploring the nuanced influence of factors on community development, particularly within the context of T/A Chimwala. This contribution is valuable for both researchers and practitioners.

Areas for Improvement:

The article mentions potential limitations, such as the lack of recognition of education's role, so it would be beneficial to try to overwhelm these limitations to improve findings and implications.

It would be reasonable to provide a more detailed background of T/A Chimwala and its specific challenges or opportunities for community development that would help the reader's understanding of the context.

Further Qualitative Analysis: While the article employs both quantitative and qualitative methods, a more in-depth qualitative analysis, such as thematic analysis of interviews, could provide richer insights into the experiences and perceptions of community members.

Discussion of Cultural Sensitivity: Given the emphasis on cultural factors, a more extensive discussion of how cultural sensitivity was incorporated into the research process and its implications for practice would be valuable.

This research is suitable for social work practitioners, researchers, and policymakers interested in community development and social work practice in diverse cultural contexts. It significantly contributes to the field of social work. Its strengths lie in its thorough methodology, clear objectives, theoretical framework, detailed findings, and practical recommendations. Addressing the areas pointed above for improvement will probably enhance the article's depth and impact.
