

Review of: "Lived Experience of School Leaders in Supervising during Remote Teaching"

Zeynep Cömert¹

¹ Bahcesehir University

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The Covid-19 pandemic is an important turning point in the history of educational sciences and researches as it offers the world of education the opportunity to experience many things that have never been experienced before. It is important for the literature to examine the experience of school leaders in these dates in depth. I congratulate the researchers for conducting a study on this subject. However, in order for the research to be up to date, I recommend that the researchers include the present day in the research by referring to the aftermath of the covid-19 pandemic. However, considering that it is a qualitative research, it is possible to say that the findings part of the research offers a very limited. For this reason, it seems important for the researchers to strengthen the findings section. On the other hand, it is noticeable that the conclusion section of the research is also quite narrow. In the light of the results obtained in the research, I think that a comprehensive conclusion section should be written for all stakeholders involved in the education system, including researchers, educational administrators and students, especially in the field of practice and policy makers. Considering all these situations, it is seen that the research needs a major revision to strengthen it.