The topic is not that recent, and as the writer mentioned, it has been researched by many before this. The novelty is not significant as the results were merely displaying the percentage rather than a detailed explanation of the research design, methods, and analysis that were employed in this research. Most of the references are outdated, thus reflecting on the fact that less research is done on this topic nowadays. It was supposed to be in Tunisia, but in the conclusion section, it was mentioned that the results were from the lecturers in Thailand - a bit confusing here.
