

Review of: "Diversity and Inclusion for Innovation-Led Growth"

Narender Nagarwal¹

¹ University of Delhi

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The article in question emphasizes how significant the inclusivity, pluralism, and diversity in the education sector. While examining numerous area related to education, the economic situation, and the technology sector, the author kept a balanced approach to the present analysis. The article primarily focuses on the significance of diversity and how technology could enhance India's educational system and economy, when the country is celebrating its 75 years of independence. This country should strive for inclusive innovation-led growth that values its diversity, preserving secular values, and minorities rights which is a reasonable proposition and an overall wise effort by the author. The article's presentation is well appreciated, despite a few small linguistic errors that can be easily overlooked. It may be accepted for publishing without any changes or revisions.