It's an interesting take on the use of smartphones with specific focus on violence. A much needed topic which requires deeper exploration. The results and findings of the study bring out a perspective but they being generic and can be applied to so many other uses of smartphones too - eg. it being used to record memories, store and share them. In such a scenario too all the mentioned factors come into play. Therefore, it'll become additionally interesting if the study could and any further work may also employ some cognitive factors which drive and motivate human behavior towards positive or negative usage of man's own creations.
