In scrutinizing the interplay between educational literature and policymaking, this article represents a commendable endeavor in the academic landscape. Authored by Ashtarian et al, the scholarly discourse navigates the intricate nexus between a specific school book and its implications for policy formulation within the educational sphere. At the intersection of pedagogy and governance, the analysis aims to proffer a nuanced examination of how the content and themes encapsulated within the school book contribute to the broader discourse shaping educational policies. The article successfully presents the extent to which the sexist expressions in the book are included in the educational process. However, the authors adeptly fail to unveil the multifaceted connections between the educational material and its potential impact on policy frameworks.

The article introduces an ambiguity in delineating the relationship between a policymaker and the authors of the referenced textbooks. A discernible instance on page 3 portrays the compiler of the educational materials as the policymaker, a premise that appears substantively untenable. Even in scenarios where both roles are assumed by the same actor, it is imperative to acknowledge that policymaking constitutes an autonomous and intricately constructed process. Consequently, a more precise approach would entail a clearer elucidation of the specific junctures at which the policymaking process converges with the intricate process of compiling academic textbooks. The latter, being a multifaceted undertaking in its own right, necessitates a nuanced exploration of its intersections with the policymaking apparatus. As such, the discourse within the article lacks the requisite depth in addressing the symbiotic relationship between academic sources and the formulation of educational policies, warranting a more comprehensive analysis of the intricate interplay between these elements.
