

Review of: "Further Chaos and Dysfunction in the Brickyard and the Systems That Support It"

Sam Lewis

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

I was not aware of Forscher's 1963 article prior to reading this but have since read the article. I think this is a great follow up piece and I can relate to much of what the article is referencing with the well-structured metaphors.

I think with the transition of Australian universities from primarily institutes of learning to big businesses since the publication of Forscher's 1963 article, this topic is more important than ever. The sacrifice of quality for quantity in order to chase bigger dollars should be a real concern for everybody, not just academics. Eventually this will affect everyone when these poorly constructed buildings collapse.