

Review of: "Post-Conflict Reconstruction: How Social Identity Change Informs our Understanding of the Ukrainian Experience of Forced Migration"

Irani da Silva¹

¹ Christ University

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The researcher has chosen a very appropriate field of study, as this area of research addresses a contemporary issue, and the problems faced by women who are forced to leave their homes. It is crucial to understand and explore the perspectives of those women following the post-migration experience as they rebuild their lives in a new society. The researcher has selected a pertinent problem for the study and contributed to the enrichment of knowledge from theoretical and practical considerations regarding this population. The title of the article is precise and explains in detail the domains covered in the study.

Further, the article is well organized and presented in order. It has an extensive review of literature related to the field of investigation. The methodology followed in the study is appropriate, keeping in view the aim and objectives.

The themes are relevant and well elaborated. The results and discussion chapter depicts the appropriate application of the concurrent techniques which have been adopted.

I congratulate the researcher on addressing a contemporary issue with rigor and depth. This study will continue to bring in much more research work in this area in the future.

Few minor observations and corrections would have added value to the research article:

1. Well-being is written differently. Some places it is written with a hyphen (well-being) and other places without a hyphen (wellbeing).
2. In the introduction, 5th paragraph, the in-text citation Jordan, Alfadhli & Drury, (2018) must be corrected. It should be Jordan, Alfadhli, and Drury (2018). Some other in-text citations throughout the article must be corrected. For example, Levine and Thompson, (2004), there is no comma.

On the whole, the article under consideration is of fairly good academic standard, fulfills the requirements of a research work, and I recommend it for publication in this journal.

Irani M. da Silva, PhD.

