This paper is an interesting contribution in the relative field. It gives a detailed analysis of the possible responses from the faculty members at the university where the case study was done.

The paper has contributed significantly, and the conclusions drawn by the authors can be applied to future scenarios. However, in future work, it is suggested to include the challenges faced by 3rd world countries with poor economies and lack of infrastructure, where electricity issues, the internet, and the availability of tablets and PCs can be issues, and possible policies can be recommended by govts to educational institutions for uniform implementation.
