

Review of: "SAM: A Language for Education"

Azam Naserpour

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The concept and theoretical notions of SAM discussed in this article are very novel. Indeed, the authors have attempted to develop a sociological language based on three 'relation spaces' containing a couple of variables. Hence, this can be used in diverse settings, which should have been mentioned by the author. The argument of the article is plausible and well-written. And so, I support the publication of this article, of course, by highlighting the following suggestions: More comprehensive relevant literature review, mentioning more practical benefits of SAM in diverse educational settings, using up-to-date references to enrich the argument, and presenting some suggestions for further research.