The authors report on an interesting argument which is certainly not common knowledge. Unfortunately, this manuscript is compromised by a distracted reporting style with multiple iterations. The authors could be much more concise; it would refine this manuscript. Also, the blood values and the chemistry should be reported in a separate table, avoiding integration in the text.

From a technical point of view, the authors should give a comment on why the sigmoid was resected. The normal procedure does not include this passage, but for sure there is a valuable explanation.

To the Editor,

The manuscript needs a rework but is worth publishing.
