The authors chose a niche area to work on, and they deserve congratulations for that. The conceptual understanding seems grounded, but the threads or rationalities leading up to them are too many and a bit too theoretical, and not in a place where they can be scientifically verified. The understanding of the concepts of soul, spirituality, and connectedness is definitely present, but we might need to hold onto one theory between the many that are used to support the paper and its understanding. While I understand that the authors are talking about the law of attraction and what having manifestations does to the outcomes that individuals dealing with EOL care or palliative care, and even a chronic illness, can think of while they are dealing with it, I would like to see the authors exploring the concept from one lens and having supporting theories to prove it, rather than too many of them. It was a good read, and the intentions were right; just a single theory would have been a great addition to the paper.
