

Review of: "Factors contributing to labour unrest at the garment factories in Bangladesh: A cross-sectional study"

Lahcene Bouriche

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The Titre of the article : "Factors Contributing to Labour Unrest at the Garment Factories in Bangladesh: A Cross-Sectional Study"

This article deals with a very interesting subject as it tries to know and analyze the factors contributing to labor unrest in a very important sector in the economy of Bangladesh.

In the introduction, the authors have defined the context to answer their problematic, which aims to determine and the factors contributing to labor unrest, but The lion's share has been allocated to the importance of the industry sector especially garment in the economy of Bangladesh to the detriment of labor unrest in the sector (challenges faced by workers, labor disputes. .).

Literature review: The authors presented a good review of the literature based on relevant, old and recent references which helped them to take an overview of their study and frame their problematic by determining the main factors labor unrest especially in industry, nevertheless, it would be better if the authors criticized these researches.

The methodology: The methodology adopted is well perceived by reading the article. It is coherent with the problematic. The authors used a questionnaire to answer their question but the work requires more details on the number of the sample and its representativeness to give more reliability to the results. The choice of the dependent variable and the independent variables were well founded. The authors have recourse to various old, recent and specialized empirical studies adequate with the problematic.

The study led to interesting results which were analyzed by the authors. The statistical study used reinforced the robustness of the models and consequently the reliability of the results. The conclusion is detailed and of an important scientific rigor which leaves questions for new research on the field.

In summary, the article provides an interesting study and full of informations on labor unrest in the garment industry sector in Bangladesh and can contribute to good decision-making and therefore to the growth of this sector.