The author has done a great job in highlighting this issue of geopolitical constructs and how history of IR guides rulemaking in the current multipolar world. The ideological roots go way far back than the Westphalian Peace of 1648 and there are abundant examples from the non-western part of the world on how empires conducted their peace efforts with vassal states and adversaries.

The article could however be made more robust in the section on 'The current world political arena' and 'What are the viable alternatives today?'. These two sections need more information and analysis particularly in tying the alternative theories and models stated in the history section with the international geopolitical arena. The article would benefit from theoretical analysis and discussion of current events.
