

Review of: "Implementing Task Substitution for Doctors and Nurses as a Key Element of Healthcare Reform"

Divya Raghavan¹

¹ Maternal and Child Health, College of Nursing, Sultan Qaboos University, Oman

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Excellent thought process, well designed. The concept and need to bring in such deliberations is well presented in the context of the current health care system in the country. However, more details about the licensing process and resources available in the health care infrastructure to initiate such task substitution between nurses and doctors could strengthen the report further.

By licensing process, how would the ANP be licensed? Are there systems existing in the country for such licensure, namely licensure exams, CPD credit assessments, and equivalency of courses between medical and nursing education? A clear review of the existing system or a proposal for the same could be added.

In terms of resources, writers could highlight more about whether the healthcare development plan of the country provides support for ANP to establish independent practice.