Dear Dr. Kelly,

I read your article with great interest. I see much value in sharing your narratives to inform, educate and inspire people by sharing your practical experiences of your work with refugees.

Throughout your text, there are many descriptions that can help practitioners and researchers in the African context/working with refugees alike. The details and lived experienced you described make it not only interesting to read, but also show some concrete ways to support this vulnerable group and to help them develop their full potential. What I personally think would add additional value is a section where you summarized your 'lessons learned', so that other people can learn to identify the most important barriers and ways to deal with them. Some examples for learning points could be: What are key stakeholders you need to have on board? What characteristics of projects make it more likely that they succeed? What were instances or environments where your support failed to make the impact you wanted and why?

Thank you for sharing your important work with the community in your article.

Respectfully,

Laura Weiss
