This narrative review addresses an important and timely topic, providing a broad overview regarding the experiences of grandparents who are involved in the raising of children with special needs and disabilities. In general, the paper is well written and remarks on the importance of the topic addressed. The descriptions of what or who is a grandparent and the various styles, roles, and types that grandparents can take on are very interesting. The main purpose of this narrative review is well explained, and the method is described in a punctual manner.

While the overall quality of the article is very good, I suggest the following:

delve deeper into the differences in the relationship between grandparents and grandchildren and between grandmothers and grandchildren and the repercussions on their health.

The author could expand Grandparent Therapeutic Interventions and Summary & Recommendations.
