Very happy for the opportunity to review this paper. The text refers to the Indian government's decision-making regarding positioning data governance as a paradigm of its healthcare system and then to its leadership in the G20 healthcare agenda. In the text it is possible to understand that the Indian experience can be an important international model for the fulfillment of global strategies related to strengthening health systems. Even though it is a relevant text from the point of view of the reported experience, it is not characterized as scientific research, because the methodology, its results and analyzes were not presented. Therefore, I do not recommend publication without asking the authors to present sufficient content to be considered a scientific article.
