

Review of: "A Survey Study on Women Entrepreneurship in the BTR Area of Assam"

Claire P. Street¹

¹ Canterbury Christ Church University

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Significant limitations include the absence of citations in the literature review and the lack of integration between your discussion of findings and the literature review.

Suggestions for improvement:

The literature review should reference existing research, academic papers, and authoritative sources. This validates the statements made and positions your research within the broader academic discourse. For instance, when discussing the growth of women's entrepreneurship in India, reference specific studies or statistical reports that illustrate this trend. The challenges women entrepreneurs face, such as socio-cultural constraints and limited access to finance, should be backed by empirical studies or real-world examples.

Ensure the sources cited are up to date and diverse, including peer-reviewed journals, government reports, and credible publications. This demonstrates thorough research and a comprehensive understanding of the subject.

When discussing the findings, regularly refer back to the literature reviewed. This helps contextualise the results within the established body of knowledge and shows how your research contributes to or challenges existing understanding. For example, if your survey reveals unique challenges women entrepreneurs face in the BTR area, compare and contrast these with the general challenges discussed in the literature review.

Use the literature review to support or question your findings. This could highlight similarities or differences between your results and previous studies, enriching the analysis.

Establish a theoretical framework in the literature review that guides your analysis. For instance, if theories of gender and entrepreneurship inform your study, use these theories to interpret your findings.

Compare your methodological approach with those discussed in the literature review, explaining how your approach adds value or a new perspective to the research area.

While focusing on the BTR area, consider incorporating literature providing a global perspective, which can offer valuable comparative insights.

