This is a very meaningful thought that adding parental diagnoses prior to the children psychiatric definition. Indeed, the psychiatric disorders of children are largely connected (or precisely due) to the prior parental mental problems. I encourage the meaningful view in the current practice, in any culture. For the present paper, I might present the following concerns:

1. There is more literature regarding the parental bonding or family relationship patterns which are closely related to the psychological (psychiatric) world of children, please also refer to these references about the family relationships. Moreover, there is some evidence of the order of caregivers or care-providers which affects children, the paper might address that further.
2. In the meantime, grandparents can also be caregivers, and the background information might be considered before the authors present their arguments.
3. Both paternal and maternal sides show their care, freedom control and autonomy denial (PBI), and their encouragement, abuse, and dominance (and general attachment, family relationship patterns) to their children. Therefore, when putting forward the necessity of diagnosing parents, these results must be considered (separate fathers from mothers or refer to the caregiver order).
4. The last paragraph of the ms can be expanded since the idea offers more sources for the family therapy for both children and parents.
5. Minor. Some literature in the References list is badly displayed.
